

Jordan Reyes

jordan@example.com | LinkedIn | (510) 555-0143 | Oakland, CA

Re: Growth Marketing Lead, Solara | February 10, 2026

Solara got my attention because SolaraNow moves the credit decision to the kitchen table, and that changes what growth is for. When approval takes days, marketing's job is persuasion. When it takes minutes, marketing's job is distribution: more installers carrying it, more homeowners finishing the flow. That second job is the one I want, and solar financing is a payments business at heart, which is where I've spent the last four years.

One story explains how I work. At Copper & Pine I suspected our paid social budget was funding habit, not results. So I turned it off. All of it, $45k a month, for 60 days, while the board waited to see what broke. Nothing broke. CAC held on organic and email, the budget stayed dead for two more quarters, and the memo explaining why became the spine of the Series A narrative. Plainly: I'd rather find out what's true than defend a line item.

That instinct is what a first growth hire owes a Series B. Your growth will be decided by installer economics and homeowner trust, not by whoever bids hardest on solar keywords. I'd start by learning where deals stall between quote and signed loan, then put the budget behind whatever shortens that path and kill whatever doesn't.

I'd welcome 30 minutes on what growth at Solara should own first.

Jordan Reyes